ILLUSTRATION ON GREED

A beggar once lived in a country. This beggar was always saying that if only he had sufficient food daily he would not be worried about anything nor would he desire more. He would be satisfied with the little he had.

One day, he saw a man passing by and he asked for alms from the man. The man obliged, opened his bag and brought some quantity of gold and put into the beggar's bag. But as he walked away, the beggar beckoned on him again and demanded for more. The man came and put into the beggar's bag more quantity of gold and walked away. The beggar beckoned on the man the third time and demanded for more gold. This time the man told the beggar that if he should put more gold into his bag, the old bag would get torn and the gold already in the bag would fall out, and the law was that if the gold should touch the ground it would vanish.

He insistently pleaded that the bag would not get torn, that the man, should add more gold to the quantity he already had. So the man added some more quantity of gold to the beggar and the gold was heavier than the bag could carry. When the beggar attempted to lift the bag, it got torn, and the gold fell on the ground and consequently disappeared.
